Only the most common of the major types are being studied. A new survey of the world's honeybees finds that African bees, which make a variety of liquid, non-sugary honey, play a bigger role in the health of the world's ecosystems than once thought. The survey focused on bees from 10 of the world's regions, finding that Africans and other bees from tropical areas have a higher number of major defensive bee venom toxins (or allergens), including phospholipase A2, hyaluronidase, a protein called apamin, and a botulinum toxin. These toxins have been used to develop treatments for severe allergies in humans, and bee venom (which is actually a bit of a misnomer because it comes from glands in the bees' mouths) is currently being developed as a therapy for allergies and other problems. Bee venom can also have lethal effects, as it paralyzes muscles and causes the bee to die, so its presence is generally a good sign that bees are healthy. The study found that the more species of venom a bee produces, the more species of plants they tend to visit. This is known as a "trade-
